

MOF CONTENT SOP

GOH CONSULTING

Goal

Turn the objections, hesitations, and questions your prospects raise before they buy into a repeatable content system that dissolves those objections at scale — so leads arrive warm and the sales call only confirms a decision they have already made.

THE ONE RULE

The real job of MOF content is to eliminate every single reason your ICP has NOT to buy. Every objection is a content piece. If it comes up more than once, it becomes a content piece. If it comes up every week, it becomes a content pillar.

What this is

MOF (middle-of-funnel) content lives between the moment someone first finds you and the moment they pay. Most people think it's just testimonials and case studies — that's a fraction of it. The real job is to move a prospect one step closer to buying with every piece, by answering the questions running through their head before they'll ever book a call:

- Is this person legit?
- Can they actually help someone like me?
- Is it worth the money?
- Will it work for my specific situation?

Every one of those questions is an objection. MOF content solves them before the prospect ever reaches you — which is what leads to PIFs (paid in full) and to sales calls that no longer feel like sales calls.

Why it matters

The sales call is not where someone decides to buy — it's where they confirm what they've already decided. If your content did its job, the decision is made before the call starts.

Here's the leverage: for every prospect who voices an objection on a call, there are hundreds in your audience thinking the exact same thing and quietly never booking because of it. Make content that addresses that objection and all of those people feel seen — and a share of them convert without you ever speaking to them. Handle objections one at a time on calls and you help one person; handle them in content and you help everyone carrying that objection in silence.

When to use it (and when not)

Use this system when:

- Running calls: You're already running sales calls and hearing real objections every week.
- Have clients: You have existing clients you can ask why they chose you.
- Cold leads: You're getting attention (TOF is working) but leads arrive cold, unconvinced, or price-sensitive.
- Heavy calls: Your close rate is lower than you want, or calls feel like heavy convincing.

Do not lean on this when:

- No audience yet: Fix top of funnel first — you can't mine objections you aren't yet hearing.
- No clients or calls: Start with the closest proxy — your own buying process (Step 3) — then layer in real objection data as it arrives.

Who owns it

The founder or coach owns the positioning and buying-process work, because it comes from inside them. The sales team and content team share the objection loop. If you're a solo operator you wear all three hats, but the weekly objection review still happens — with yourself, on paper.

Before you start

- Access to your recent sales calls, notes, or recordings.

- Your last 10 onboarding or application forms.
- A list of your top 20% of clients and a way to book short calls with them.
- A recurring 30-minute slot for the weekly sales-plus-content sync.
- The mindset to genuinely feel like you don't know anything about your market yet: Most people sell to the past version of themselves and assume they already know how their prospect thinks. Drop the assumption.

Step 1: do the market research — put on your ICP's shoes

Goal: understand how your prospect actually thinks, in their words, not yours. If you knew exactly how your prospects think, you'd make seven figures a year easily — most people don't, because they sell to a market that could be the past version of themselves and assume nothing has changed. Stepping into your ICP's shoes whenever you want is the single biggest marketing cheat code there is; the person with the best understanding of the market always wins.

- Collect one insight per call: Treat each sales call and client conversation as data collection first, not just a pitch.
- Note their exact language: The words they use, the fears they name, and the alternatives they compared you to.
- Run it as a loop: Collect data on what's working, get feedback, improve, repeat — the biggest companies all do this.

Step 2: get clear on what's stopping your prospects

Goal: capture every objection before it dies in the sales call, and route the recurring ones into content. You already have a goldmine in your sales calls every week — every objection, hesitation, and question a prospect raises. The problem is that information dies in the call and never makes it into your content.

- The mechanism: Once a week, sales and content sit down for 30 minutes with one agenda item: what objections came up this week? Then, for each, trace it back.

WORKED EXAMPLE — THE OBJECTION-TO-PILLAR PIPELINE

Objection heard on calls: "I don't have enough time to create content."

Because it kept coming up week after week, it wasn't treated as a one-off — it became the video "How I created 10 Reels and 1 YouTube video in 2 hours." It performed well enough (~60,000–70,000 views on the original) that the format got reused three to four times, with reworked versions pushing toward 100,000 views. One recurring objection, mined from calls, became a repeatable content pillar and pre-handled that objection for hundreds of silent prospects.

Trace each objection through three questions: OBJECTION (what did they say?) → WHAT (what content piece did they first watch?) → WHY (why did that content resonate?). Then ask whether your higher-level ICP resonates with that same content. Map objection to content type:

- “I don’t have enough time to create content”: A workflow video showing exactly how fast content can be made.
- “I’ve tried every format but nothing works”: A video on how to find formats that give you energy.
- “I don’t know if it will work in my niche”: A client case-study breakdown (e.g. a client taken from 10,000 to 151,000, or a mobility coach reaching ~70,000 views on a “how to kick higher” piece).
- The rule for prioritising: If an objection comes up more than once, it becomes a content piece. If it comes up every week, it becomes a core content pillar. The objections you hear most often are your most important content.

Step 3: reverse-engineer your OWN buying process

Goal: find your positioning by understanding why you buy, because the same reasons drive why your clients buy. Ask yourself why you chose to be in this program, and look back at the form you filled out. The reasons you chose your coach are likely the same reasons your clients chose you — you saw something in them you recognise in yourself.

- The 10 reasons + ask-why-3x drill
 - List 10 reasons: Write down every reason you chose to work with your mentor — get to 10.
 - Ask why three times: For each reason, go three layers deeper.
 - Read the list: These are the exact reasons your clients will choose you, if you make them visible in your content.

WORKED EXAMPLE — GOING THREE LAYERS DEEP

Surface reason: “They seemed to actually care. It didn’t feel transactional.”

Why did that matter? Because I’d spent money before with people who took the check and disappeared. I needed to know someone would still show up when things got hard.

Why was that important? Because the hardest moments in business aren't strategy problems — they're moments you want to quit and nobody takes it seriously. I was investing in someone being in my corner, not just in information.

And underneath that? I'd done this alone for a long time and was exhausted by the silence. I didn't just want a coach — I wanted to stop feeling alone in it.

What this means for your content: show what happens after the sale. A clip from a group call, a message you sent a client late at night, a win you celebrated together. People watching aren't seeing a service — they're seeing what it feels like to be supported.

- Where to dig for positioning: Your backstory, a unique experience, your values, contrarian beliefs, personal and client results, a sacrifice you made, and how you communicate.
- On niching down: The fear is that niching down excludes clients — the opposite is true. Content that tries to resonate with everyone resonates with no one deeply enough to act. Speak with extreme specificity to one exact person and people outside that profile still feel it, because specificity is what makes content feel real.
- Mine your top 20%: Ask what specific problem they were solving when they found you, what made them choose you, and what you helped them see. Book short calls and ask directly: "What was the one thing that made you decide to work with me? What specific content got you to reach out?"
- Sharpen your contrarian take: What does everyone in your space say that you fundamentally disagree with? Angles that already work: organic vs. paid ads, your process vs. the standard approach, your onboarding process (over $600,000 in referrals), your post-booking process (closing $25,000 deals), managing an underperforming team member, and how your sales call sets expectations and only takes on good-fit clients.

Step 4: run the Buyer Mirror Form, make your values visible

Goal: get feedback on what's actually working, in your clients' own words, and turn it into content. These answers don't tell you what you think is working — they tell you what is actually working, in the exact words your clients use. Read through them and the patterns become your content and messaging.

- Make your values visible
 - Show how you handle a difficult client situation.
 - Show what you will not compromise on.

- Show how your decisions are driven by something beyond making money.

When Step 4 is working, MOF content is tracking objections, dissolving beliefs, and pre-handling thoughts your ICP hasn't even voiced yet. Leads stop being cold; by the time they reach out, the sale is already half made. Build the system, stay consistent, and your sales calls will never feel like sales calls again.

Choosing your approach to objection content

There's more than one valid way to turn an objection into content — pick based on the objection type.

- A. Workflow / demonstration video: Show, don't tell. Best for practical or logistical objections ("I don't have time", "it's too hard").
 - Pros: Highly credible, hard to argue with, evergreen and reusable as a pillar.
 - Cons: More production effort; needs a real process to show.
- B. Client case-study breakdown: Best for "will it work for me / my niche" objections. Break down a specific client result and the path to it.
 - Pros: Removes doubt with proof; transferable across niches when framed well.
 - Cons: Needs client permission and real numbers; weak without specificity.
- C. Story / perspective shift: Best for belief-level and identity objections. Shift the belief through a story, not an argument.
 - Pros: Moves people emotionally, hard for competitors to copy, builds positioning.
 - Cons: Requires vulnerability and specificity; surface-level stories fall flat.

What good looks like

- You can name the top 5 objections you hear and point to a content piece for each.
- Recurring objections have been promoted to content pillars, not one-off posts.
- Your content uses your clients' exact language, pulled from calls and the Buyer Mirror Form.
- Leads arrive on calls already warm, referencing your content, needing less convincing.
- The weekly sales-plus-content sync is actually happening and feeding the content calendar.

Common mistakes

- Treating MOF as testimonials only: Testimonials are a slice — the job is eliminating every reason not to buy.
- Letting objections die in the call: If they never leave the sales conversation, hundreds of silent prospects stay stuck.
- Answering an objection once and moving on: If it recurs, it's a pillar, not a footnote.
- Selling to the past version of yourself: Assuming you already know how your ICP thinks stops you from actually listening.
- Staying broad to avoid excluding anyone: Speaking to everybody means relating to nobody.
- Settling for surface-level answers: The power in the buying-process drill is three layers deep.
- Arguing people out of beliefs: Beliefs shift through story and perspective, not debate.

Edge cases and exceptions

- No clients yet: You can't run the Buyer Mirror Form — start with Step 3 on yourself and treat your own buying process as the proxy until real client data exists.
- Few or no sales calls: Objection mining is thin — prioritise top of funnel, and pull objections from DMs, comments, and discovery conversations meanwhile.
- An objection that's really a fit problem: Not every objection should be dissolved — some correctly filter out people who aren't a good fit. Setting expectations and only taking the right clients is part of the system.
- Solo operator: The weekly objection sync still happens — with yourself and your notes.

Things to note

- Frequency is the signal: How often an objection recurs tells you whether it's a post or a pillar.
- Exact wording matters: Use the language clients use, not the language you'd use to describe your own work.

- Specificity beats reach: The more specific the content, the more real it feels — even to people outside the exact profile.
- This is a loop, not a launch: Collect, feedback, improve, repeat — forever.

Quick checklist

- ☐ Set up a weekly 30-minute call between sales and content. Only agenda item: what objections came up this week?
- ☐ Go through your last 10 onboarding forms and find out WHY clients chose you. Turn these into your next 3 pieces of content.
- ☐ Write down the 5 most common objections you hear on calls and identify the underlying belief behind each.
- ☐ For each belief, outline one piece of content that shifts it through story or perspective, not argument.
- ☐ Write down the 3 most common limiting beliefs your ICP holds and plan a piece of content for each from your own experience.
- ☐ Identify your clearest point of difference and make one piece of content this week that demonstrates it.
- ☐ Do the ask-why-3x drill: 10 reasons you chose your mentor, each taken three layers deep.
- ☐ Book calls with your top 20% of clients and ask what made them decide and what content got them to reach out.

Gaps to confirm

- Buyer Mirror Form: The exact questions and where it lives — referenced as a named Step 4 asset but not fully shown.
- View counts & client-result figures: Confirm the “10 Reels in 2 hours” video views and reuse multiple against real analytics before publishing externally.
- Referral & deal figures: The $600,000 in referrals and $25,000 deal size — confirm current numbers and any commission structure before quoting.
- Sync cadence: Whether the 30-minute, both-teams weekly cadence is fixed or adjustable per team size.
